A successful presentation hinges on knowing your audience and knowing what they want to know. Connect with your audience through shared experiences or concerns.

Who is the audience?
- Are the members of your audience your peers?
- Are they students?
- Are they your superiors?

This is an audience-centered activity. Your objective is to connect with the audience and tell them something worthwhile.

What is their level of expertise?
- Are the members of your audience familiar with the topic?
- Are they familiar with the jargon, but not the details?
- Is this the first time they’ve even heard of this subject matter?

Find out their expertise then gear your talk accordingly. Never present material too complex for your audience

What are your audience’s concerns? Connect with them on basis of those concerns.
- May be as simple as talking with them about visiting their area at an earlier time or perhaps an interesting landmark they have in their town.
- Commiserate with them – “I’m sure you get as frustrated as I do when . . . “
- Speak with the audience before your talk then try to weave those conversations into your presentation (dual purpose – research shows that this relieves a great amount of stress)

Knowing your audience allows you to more easily connect with them. This tells them that they are important, which makes for a very powerful talk.
